Scoretary Stanton.

Mr. Stanton has few friends in these Southern States—here he is regarded as a man of most violent passions, which have become embittered by four years of civil war against the people and against the individuals of these States—his removal from the Cabinet would be a source of great pleasure throughout the South. Such removal would be accepted as source. removal would be accepted as a good will offering to these people, as an earnest that peace and harmony, good feeling and kindness were really desired on the part of the North, and that to obtain these great objects, even the claims of Mr. Stanton were not permitted to intervene between the Union and the patriotism of the Even while sharing with the people of the South the bitterness of feeling toward the Secretary of War, we must bear testimony to his firmness, perhaps stubborness, to his unflagging industry, and to his devoted sentiment of Unionism. An earnest enemy is more admirable than a vacillating and unstable man. Mr. Stanton, during the war, never failed in anything that could contribute to the success of his cause. When defeat overtook his arms, when the public spirit waned under repeated military disaster, and all seemed lost for his cause, neither his resolution nor his courage failed him. One commander after another was dismissed, as one army after another was destroyed. McClellan made way for Pope, who, more unfortunate than his predeces-sor, paid the same penalty. Again McClellan was superseded by Burn-side, and then Hooker, and then Meade, and then Grant. But amid all the disasters that caused these all the disasters that caused these frequent changes, the Secretary remained firm and immovable—determined and unyielding in defeat, he was seldom tried by victory; but in defeat his resolution never to give up the cause was often made apparent. To no one man in the United States more than to Mr. Stanton can the success of the United States army be attributed. Stanton in Washington, co-operating with exhaustion in the South, overthrew the Confederacy. Neither Lincoln, nor Grant, nor Sherman, contributed more to success than Stanton.

His implacable and unrelenting hatred of the people of these States, his want of confidence in the honesty of their oaths, his violent and vindic-tive animosity toward everything Southern, now stand in the way of peace and harmony, and his retirement would be the means of cementing the Union. Those great qualities which he exhibited during the war in the administration of the Depart-ment are no longer needed—they are actual impediments in quiet and restoration. He could not be otherwise than bitter and unforgiving, because his nature is harsh, severe, and unrelenting. He may excite admiration, but he can never enjoy popularity either North or South. Men like him are never popular; they are useful, and, in times of emergency, are made use of, but they are never beloved. He has justly won the admiration of the North, but he now stands in the way

Cabinet depends on chances. In the violence of conflict, motives are often misunderstood and mis-represented; the means taken to obtain an end are often necessarily harsh, and sometimes illegal and unconstitutional, but if the end be worth the sacrifices required for its attainment, of the complete restoration of the country; his services can be dispensed with without danger to peace. We are glad to learn that his seat in the

of what consequence are the means? Mr. Stanton has been greatly de-nounced for his violent measures against the liberties of speech, the press and the person. He trampled under foot these great rights in the pursuit of his great and such he pursuit of his great end, and he succeeded. On the other hand, Mr. Davis paid the most scrupulous regard to all the proprieties of Magna Charta, and he failed. If the rights of persons and of property, if the musty nonentities of Magna Charta had been utterly disregarded and forgotten, and national inde-Charta had been utterly disregarded and forgotten, and national independence had been pursued with an eye single to its attainment, and a hand firm to its purpose, if less regard had been paid to individual liberty and more to national independence; if these Southern States could have a Stanton in their War Department, with their Lees, Jacksons and Johnstons in the field, the sons and Johnstons in the field, the United States might have had as many Grants and Shermans as there were first and last commanders to the Army of the Potomac, and this day would have witnessed the Confede-racy a nationality. But Mr. Stanton had served his country in all that he can be of service; now he is in the way of that country's unity. Let him retire, and when we have another war, may he be the Secretary.
